

The proposed single-family house constitutes a volumetric exploration that responds to a steeply contoured site, articulating habitation through a calibrated division between privacy and openness. The project both rises above and embeds itself within the hillside, negotiating the terrain's pronounced relief. Owing to buildable surface constraints, the principal volume is spatially expanded through generous ceiling heights and a protruding wall element that introduces light and air while maintaining a compact footprint. This upper volume accommodates an open-plan living room and kitchen, extending onto a large terrace that frames the landscape and registers the site's topography. Beneath it, the more introverted private spaces—bedrooms and a studio—open quietly toward the garden and river.
